

Architects Make Brave Exhibition Despite Fire Loss

League's Show in Fine Arts Building—Ernest Lawson's Paintings.

The Architectural League makes a brave showing in the rooms of the Fine Arts Building in West Fifty-seventh street that were not destroyed by the fire and with the exhibits that were rescued from that disaster. Here and there photographs and architectural plans show smoke stains, and from the entrance hall a dramatic glimpse may be obtained of the ruins of the Vanderbilt Gallery, now open to the sky and made still more forlorn by a covering of snow and ice, but the rooms upstairs occupied by the league have been made into a gallery, so that three fairly large halls remain, in which the league has found it possible to put forward an interesting record of the season's art effort.

Of course there has been no attempt to reconstitute the ambitious project of a show that was destroyed, of uniting in one display an impressive ensemble of all the allied with architecture, such as sculpture, ironwork, glass, furniture and interior decoration, for it was the objects in these categories that had been placed in the main gallery and were ruined. As a consequence, the exhibition permits architecture to dominate as it used to in the exhibitions of several years ago, and the collection is well worth study upon the part of the public, particularly the young when the necessity for construction of all sorts has become apparent in all parts of the country, to make up for the neglect of war time.

Conspicuous on the walls are groups of photographs and plans of the work of Delano and Aldrich, winners of the architectural League's medal of honor for architecture. Among the buildings shown in their exhibits are a residence at Riverside, L. I., and one at Oyster Bay, and Greenwich House, New York City. The architects have seemed to show how to unite a necessary effect of modernity with a background of old American traditions. Indeed, the cheering aspect of the whole exhibition is that the long series of recently constructed homes—one gallery is entirely given over to plans for small residences—have not been built in any country but this. The optimistic spectator will also feel that the average of taste displayed in the designing of these houses is also up to the level of the higher level than prevailed, say, ten years ago.

Other notable work has been contributed by these architects: McKim, Mead & White, architects of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and of the New York Public Library, and of the New York City Hall. The mural paintings, sculptures and plans by students of the American Academy of Art, were almost wholly saved from the fire, as they were in the basement of the building. The architectural designs of the students of the Beaux Arts Institute of Design, among the sculptures now shown are the magnificent figure of a woman by John J. MacNeil, the "Wreath" by Herbert Nebel and figures by Mrs. H. P. Whitney, Miss Marjorie Curtis and Mrs. Elmer Meyer.

The annual exhibition of landscapes by Ernest Lawson has come to be an annual event at the Daniel Gallery, and the group of pictures by the artist now on view there is exciting the usual attention among amateur collectors. Mr. Lawson's style has changed a trifle this year, perhaps, but if so, it is not to the detriment of his work. He has watched his development very closely, and perhaps his choice of subjects, also, has varied. These questions provide matter for debate among collectors, but there is no special concern for the public. The fact that Mr. Lawson keeps command over his iridescent colors to such an extent that his pigments seem to come from the canvas, and his snow scenes and river scenes are handled with the accustomed breadth and authority. It probably will be judged by most students of the new school that the best of the new school, the one called "Midway Day" in March.

Philharmonic Society's Concert.

A change in the programme of the Philharmonic Society's concert given yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall no doubt brought disappointment to some in the audience, which filled the house. In a Beethoven-Wagner-Liszt programme, which had won favor in a recital here this season, was to have been a number from Beethoven's "Moonlight" and Liszt's "Twenty-third Psalm" with Josef Strakosky's orchestral setting. Printed slips announced that owing to illness Mr. McQuah would be unable to appear, and selections for orchestra would take the place of his numbers. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Liszt's "Tasso" were the two substitutes.

Beethoven's "Coriolanus" and "Leonore No. 3" overture, Wagner's "Entrance of the Gods into Valhalla" from "Rheingold," the "Hunt" overture from "Die Meistersinger" and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 were the other numbers. The performance of the orchestra seemed often dull and listless until Liszt's "Tasso" was reached. Here and later it often played with superb beauty of tone, finished phrasing and spirit.
